EXPLANATION OF WHY THIS CASE IS A CASE OF PUBLIC OR GREAT GENERAL INTEREST AND INVOLVES A SUBSTANTIAL CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION

The applicant-appellant (hereinafter referred to as appellant) obtained a pardon from the governor for a 1981 conviction for breaking and entering but soon discovered that the pardon was fairly worthless unless the underlying records of the conviction were sealed. He then embarked upon a pro se attempt to have the records of his conviction judicially sealed based upon his pardon. The trial court granted his request noting that the pardon entitled the applicant to have his record sealed citing to the only case on point, State v. Cope, 111 Ohio App.3d 309, 676 N.E.2d 141 (1996), which held that “a trial court may exercise its jurisdiction to seal the record of a conviction which has been erased by a pardon, regardless of whether the petitioner has other offenses on his record” and further noted that, “[a] pardon without expungement is not a pardon.” Id. 111 Ohio App.3d at 312.

The state appealed this ruling and argued that the trial court lacked authority to seal the records of a pardoned conviction in lieu of any express statutory authority. Undersigned counsel was appointed to file an amicus brief for the pro se applicant and it was argued in response that trial courts have the inherent authority to seal records in the interest of justice and that the granting of a pardon by the governor created a situation where the interests of justice are generally served by an order to seal the records of the underlying conviction.

After the amicus brief was filed, the Summit County Court of Appeals rendered a decision in State & Akron v. Boykin, 9th Dist. Nos. 25752 & 25845, 2012-Ohio-1381, holding that courts are not required to seal records following a pardon. The appellate court noted in a two/one decision that the courts have the inherent power to seal records following a pardon but are not required to do so in every case. Id. at ¶¶ 7-8. This decision was accepted for review and this Court also accepted it as being in conflict with State v. Cope, supra. See, State & Akron v. Boykin, Case Nos. 2012-0808 & 2012-1216, currently pending in the Ohio Supreme Court. The issue on conflict is “Whether a pardon conclusively entitles the recipient to have her pardoned convictions sealed?”

The appellate court below thereafter issued a decision that went well beyond the holding in Boykin, supra. The Franklin County Court of Appeals reversed the trial court’s judgment herein and held that courts have no inherent power or authority to seal the record of a conviction, which had been the subject of an executive pardon by the governor. The appellant has subsequently filed a motion to certify this matter as a conflict on the following:

1. May a trial court exercise its jurisdiction over its own records to seal the record of a conviction, which has been erased by a pardon, regardless of whether the petitioner has other offenses on his record?
2. Whether a pardon conclusively entitles the recipient to have his pardoned conviction sealed?

Since this Court has already determined that the issues herein have merit and present a conflict between appellate districts, this case should be accepted for review with briefing stayed pending this Court’s determination of the Boykin cases. If this Court’s decision does not resolve both the issues herein, then further briefing can be ordered by the Court.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE AND FACTS

The appellant lived a less than exemplary life from 1973 to 1981 when he had several felony convictions. Undersigned counsel actually represented the appellant in 1981 on his last felony conviction, which was for breaking and entering, the subject matter of the instant case. According to the judgment entry in the record, he entered a guilty plea and received a prison term of 1½ to 5 years to be served concurrently with a prison term imposed by Delaware County.

Since then, the appellant has done well. He served a short time in prison and turned his life around. He married a woman with four children whom he supported and cared for. They had another child together. He worked and took care of the family and became active in a church. His wife became disabled and he took care of her and the children. He was an exemplary employee. He obtained a job as a custodian for the Dublin School system. When he applied for the job, he noted on the application form, where it asked for his record, that he would discuss it. He managed to convince his employer that he had turned his life around and he was given a chance at employment where he was able to demonstrate that this was indeed the case. He worked as a custodian for twenty-one years. He won awards for perfect attendance and rose from custodian to shift supervisor. The Dublin Custodial Operations Manager described him as a great employee with a great attitude and demeanor who was a pleasure to work with.

This job ended when the local newspaper published an article noting the criminal records of some of the school employees. He was terminated after twenty-one years of employment because of his record and he experienced the embarrassment in the community and in his church that could be expected as a result of his past being revealed in such a public manner. However, he persevered and took a minimum-wage job washing dishes at Bob Evans and also held down part-time jobs as a custodian at a physician's office and at a church and continued to help his youngest daughter and two-year-old grandchild who resided with him.

As a result of all that happened, the appellant, on his own, filed an application for a pardon and attached letters in support. He received a pardon for his criminal offenses, including the instant offense for breaking and entering on January 7, 2011. He then, pro se, sought to have his record of conviction sealed in this case. The trial court was advised that the appellee was not eligible for the statutory sealing of his record because he was not a first offender pursuant to the statutory requirements. The trial court nevertheless ordered the record to be sealed based upon the fact that the defendant had received a pardon for this offense and that the only controlling case law on point, State v. Cope, 111 Ohio App.3d 309, 676 N.E.2d 141 (1996), held that records should be sealed following a pardon. The state appealed and the appellate court “reluctantly” reversed the trial court’s decision after holding that the trial court had no inherent authority to seal the records of a pardoned conviction in the absence of any statutory authority to do so.

ARGUMENT IN SUPPORT OF THE PROPOSITION OF LAW

PROPOSITION OF LAW

A trial court has the inherent authority to seal the records of a conviction, which has been erased by a pardon from the governor, in order to give effect to an important constitutional provision.

Court’s Have the Inherent Power to Seal Records Following a Pardon

The Franklin County Court of Appeals made a pretty amazing proclamation in its ruling below when it held that trial court had no inherent authority to seal the records of a pardoned conviction in the absence of any statutory authority. Inherent powers are essential to the proper functioning of courts and generally courts should be reluctant to abdicate these powers when they are critical to the ability of the courts to do justice. The ruling by the appellate court herein was wrong and is contradicted by previous rulings by this Court and a history and tradition of courts exercising power over its own records to ensure that justice is done.

Inherent powers of the courts are exercised across a broad spectrum of judicial functions. “[C]ourts may employ their inherent powers ‘to fashion any remedy necessary for the proper administration of justice’” and courts have the “inherent power to prevent a miscarriage of justice or manifest injustice. Felix F. Stumpf, , Inherent Powers of the Court, at 1-2, The National Judicial College (2008). It is widely recognized that although the public has a right and interest in the openness of the judicial process that courts still have the inherent power to control public access to court records. Courts may deny access to court records to preserve the right of the parties to a fair trial, to protect privacy interests of litigants or third parties, to protect trade secrets, in the interests of national or state security, to protect confidential informants, to safeguard an ongoing investigation, and for any reason necessary in the interest of justice after a proper balancing of the competing interests.

The names and addresses of jurors have been kept secret, even from the defendant, at the government's request. General search warrants are sometimes ordered sealed in order to protect confidential informants or an ongoing investigation even though these are public records under the law and otherwise would be open to inspection.¹ See, State v. Lawson, 11th Dist. No. 2001-L-071, 2002-Ohio-5605, ¶ 23 (right of defendant to examine affidavit in support of search warrant may be denied if government demonstrates a compelling interest to keep it under seal)

In In re T.R., 52 Ohio St.3d 6, 556 N.E.2d 439 (1990), this Court held that a trial court could restrict public access to juvenile court proceedings, determining if a child is abused, neglected, or dependent, or determining child custody, if it finds that there exists a reasonable and substantial basis for believing that public access could harm the child or endanger adjudication fairness.

Even criminal court proceedings and records can be closed or sealed based on findings that closure is essential to preserve higher values and is narrowly tailored to serve that interest. Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court, 464 U.S. 501, 510, 104 S.Ct. 819, 824, 78 L.Ed.2d 629, (1984); Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court, 457 U.S. 596, 607-608, 102 S.Ct. 2613, 2620-2621, 73 L.Ed.2d 248, (1982).

¹ While statutory authority exists to seal interception warrants under R.C.2933.56(B), there does not appear to be any statutory authority to seal general warrants or their affidavits. These are apparently done under the inherent power of the courts.

This Court has specifically recognized that courts have the inherent power to seal their records when the interests of justice so require when it promulgated Sup.R. 45(E), which specifically authorizes courts to restrict public access to records if it finds that “allowing public access is outweighed by a higher interest.”

This Court also held that courts have the inherent power to seal records in Pepper Pike v. Doe, 66 Ohio St.2d 374, 421 N.E.2d 1303 (1981). The statute allowing for the sealing of convictions, R.C. 2953.32, was enacted January 1, 1974. However, the defendant in Pepper Pike had been charged with assault in 1978 by the wife of the defendant’s ex-husband. This charge was dismissed against the defendant on February 8, 1979. The defendant then filed a motion for the expungement of all of her records. The municipal court denied the motion for expungement, asserting that it had no authority to do so. At the time, R.C. 2953.52, the statute allowing for the sealing of records following dismissals or not guilty findings, did not exist. It was not enacted until 1984.

This Court noted that first offenders could seek to have their records sealed under R.C. 2953.32 but that there was no statutory authority for expunging or sealing records of criminal cases that were dismissed. This Court noted that “even absent statutory authorization” trial courts had been known to expunge criminal records out of “a concern for preservation of privacy interest” and that some courts had done so under the “concern for due process rights.” Id. at 376. In a unanimous decision, this Court held that the criminal charge and dismissal with prejudice were “exceptional circumstances as to make appropriate the exercise of the trial court’s jurisdiction to expunge and seal all records in the case.” The Court further noted that the basis for such expungement, in our view, is the constitutional right to privacy. Id. at 377.

The instant case is similar to but much stronger than Pepper Pike v. Doe, supra. While there is no statutory procedure for sealing records following a pardon, a pardon is an exceptional circumstance that justifies a sealing of the records. This Court noted that the constitutional right to privacy could justify the sealing of records. The constitutional right to privacy is found only in the penumbra of other constitutional rights. See, Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510. However, the Ohio Constitution provides expressly for the power of the governor to pardon and if the courts fail to seal their records following a pardon, this constitutional grant of power will be rendered meaningless by the failure of the courts to act in comity with the executive branch. Thus this case involves not only privacy interests but also constitutional aspects of the pardon power.

The appellate court, below, held that Pepper Pike was limited to only situations where no conviction resulted. This is not true. Pepper Pike stands for the proposition that courts have the inherent power to seal their records when it is in the interest of justice to do so. Even if the appellate court's interpretation were correct, it was still faulty because there is no conviction after a pardon has been issued.

Courts have broad powers to regulate court matters to ensure that justice is done. This extends to the ability to regulate and control its own records, but, as in any case, competing interests must be weighed.

The Trial Court Properly Determined that the Interest of Justice Warranted the Sealing of the Records

The appellate court really did not address this issue because it held that the trial court did not have the authority to seal the records of the pardoned offense. The appellate court "reluctantly" reversed the trial court's decision because it erroneously determined that it had no choice.

In State v. Cope, 111 Ohio App.3d 309, 676 N.E.2d 14, (1996), the court noted that Cope was not eligible for a statutory expungement following the granting of an unconditional pardon by the governor. However, the court noted that the record should be sealed following a pardon.

The court held:

Under R.C. 2967.04(B), “an unconditional pardon relieves the person to whom it is granted of all disabilities arising out of the conviction or convictions from which it is granted.” See, also, R.C. 2961.01. In State ex rel. Gordon v. Zangerle (1940), 136 Ohio St. 371, 376, 16 O.O. 536, 538, 26 N.E.2d 190, 194, the Supreme Court of Ohio held that “a full pardon purges away all guilt and leaves the recipient from a legal standpoint, in the same condition as if the crime had never been committed * * *.” (Emphasis added.) See, also, Commonwealth v. Sutley (1977), 474 Pa. 256, 273-274, 378 A.2d 780, 789, which holds that a pardon of an offender “blots out the very existence of his guilt, so that, in the eye of the law, he is thereafter as innocent as if he had never committed the offense.”

In Pepper Pike v. Doe (1981), 66 Ohio St.2d 374, 20 O.O.3d 334, 421 N.E.2d 1303, the Ohio Supreme Court held that the inherent powers of the trial court could be invoked to order the sealing of its own records when charges against a person were dismissed with prejudice. The Supreme Court stated, “The trial courts have authority to order expungement where such unusual and exceptional circumstances make it appropriate to exercise jurisdiction over the matter.” Pepper Pike, supra, paragraph two of the syllabus. While a factual distinction can be drawn between a person who has charges dismissed with prejudice and a person who is convicted and receives a pardon, that distinction is immaterial, because the pardon places the recipient, from a legal standpoint, in the same condition as if the crime had never been committed. State ex rel. Gordon, supra.

The granting of a pardon is an “exceptional and unusual” circumstance, and the trial court was correct in holding that it could seal the record of Cope's conviction. If anything, the order should not have even been necessary - Cope received nothing more than what he was entitled to receive pursuant to his pardon. Under R.C. 2967.04(B), “an unconditional pardon relieves the person to whom it is granted of all disabilities arising out of the conviction or convictions from which it is granted.” See, also, R.C. 2961.01.

We discern no reason that the trial court could not order the sealing of its records pursuant to Cope's pardon, even though Cope was not eligible to have his record sealed under R.C. 2953.32. Cope did not need his record sealed at the trial court's discretion because his 1973 conviction had been pardoned by the Governor-what he needed was for the trial court to help him obtain the sealing to which he was entitled because of the pardon. That the trial judge chose to characterize the entry as a statutory expungement is of no import, especially because the Ohio Supreme Court has indicated that when sealing a record using judicial powers, courts should generally follow the statutory form. Pepper Pike, supra, 66 Ohio St.2d at 377, 20 O.O.3d at 335, 421 N.E.2d at 1306.

We hold that a trial court may exercise its jurisdiction to seal the record of a conviction which has been erased by a pardon, regardless of whether the petitioner has other offenses on his record. “A pardon without expungement is not a pardon.” Commonwealth v. C.S. (1987), 517 Pa. 89, 534 A.2d 1053. Accordingly, we overrule both assignments of error and affirm the judgment of the trial court. [Id. at 111 Ohio App.3d 311-312, Bold emphasis added, footnotes omitted]

The boldly emphasized language above is what this case is all about. If the appellee does not have his record sealed, then the pardon is meaningless to him and even more importantly, the power invested in the governor, by the Ohio Constitution, to grant pardons is diluted and rendered meaningless in most of the instances where it is generally exercised.

The Pardon Power

The power to pardon is considered to be very important in the justice system. Our nation, and almost every single state, as well as most countries, have some form of pardon where a person can be relieved from the consequences of committing a crime. The power to pardon is set forth in the Ohio Constitution. While a person can be pardoned to relieve the person of perhaps an unjust conviction or an overly harsh sentence, this is usually not the case in Ohio. Pardons of any form are relatively rare in comparison to the number of crimes committed. The vast majority of the pardons issued in this state are for cases similar to the one herein where the offender has completed his sentence and has spent a number of years living a crime-free life. In such situations, the entire motive and purpose for seeking and granting a pardon is to remove the stigma and embarrassment that attaches to having a very public record. Thus a pardon without a sealing of the record is useless.

Records of a person's convictions can easily be accessed online through the clerk of court's website for any particular county and there are a number of commercial background-checking companies that offer their services for a fee. Reporters, employers, landlords, and others can easily access a person's record.

It is the existence and stigma of his thirty-year-old prior record that embarrassed the defendant, cost him his job of twenty-one years, hindered his efforts for new employment and for more gainful employment, and motivated him to seek a pardon. Our society has long recognized the importance of redemption and forgiveness for past offenses, which is why the power to pardon was placed in both the national and state constitutions. The power to pardon, properly exercised, is an act of justice and is supported by a wise public policy. It extends the possibility of redemption and encourages people to live law-abiding lives. It is a carrot that society places great value upon. The power to pardon is of constitutional significance and the courts must give due deference to the governor's exercise of this important constitutional power.

When the state constitution gives the governor the power to grant pardons, the courts cannot decline to give the decision effect. The appellate court's decision has eliminated the motive and purpose for the appellant, and most other applicants, to obtain a pardon. If the records cannot be sealed, what is the use of seeking a pardon? This is not the law and should not be the law. The historical purpose of a pardon, or at least of the type granted herein, is to blot out of existence the guilt of the offender so that he is as innocent as if he or she had never committed the offense. Its purpose is to make the offender as it were "a new man" and give him new credit and capacity. Illinois C.R. Co. v. Bosworth, 133 U.S. 92, 10 Sup.Ct. 231, 33 L.Ed.2d 550 (1890). As stated in State ex rel. Gordon v. Zangerle, 136 Ohio St. 371, 26 N.E.2d 190 (1940), a “full pardon purges away all guilt and leaves the recipient from a legal standpoint, in the same condition as if the crime had never been committed.” Citing to Knapp v. Thomas, 39 Ohio St. 377, 381,

The only way the appellee or others, who are not eligible for the statutory sealing of their records, can ever obtain relief from the onerous burden of their criminal record is to seek a pardon. The Ohio Constitution provides for the remedy of a pardon but the appellate court has eviscerated a pardon as a viable remedy by claiming that this does not entitle the offender to the sealing of his or her record.

The branches of the government were created to ensure a balance of power. Each branch serves as a check on the power of the others but each branch also depends upon the other branches to honor and recognize the proper exercise of its power. The Ohio Constitution has provided for the power of the governor to issue a pardon in this case and the courts must act in comity with the executive branch by extending the recognition needed to honor this important power. Each branch of government depends upon the other branches of government to act in comity with one another. The legislature would be rendered ineffective if the executive branch did not attempt to enforce their laws or if the judicial branch ignored them. Likewise the judicial branch would be useless if the executive branch refused to heed or enforce court orders.

If the courts do not seal their records when a person has been pardoned from an old conviction, then a pardon becomes meaningless. The only reason that the appellee filed for a pardon was to have his record sealed. If the courts can seal records to protect privacy interests, not expressly enumerated in the Constitution but found in the penumbras thereof, then the courts can seal records to protect and carry out the pardon power that is expressly provided for in the Ohio Constitution. See, Pepper Pike v. Doe, supra.

This Court and courts throughout the state have noted that the statutes providing for the sealing of records protect the privacy interests of those with a criminal record from having the information publically disseminated. This Court in State ex rel. Cincinnati Enquirer v. Winkler, 101 Ohio St.3d 382, 2004-Ohio-1581, 805 N.E.2d 1094, held that law allowing for the sealing of criminal records is an attempt to balance a “defendant’s constitutional right to privacy” against the “public’s right of access” to records. The Court noted that, “The defendant’s right to privacy takes into account the public policy of providing a second chance to criminal defendants.” Id. at ¶ 10.

Societies and religions throughout the world recognize the benefits and morality of second chances and redemption. This Court has noted that the sealing, or expungement statutes, are based upon the public policy of providing further opportunities for those convicted of a crime. It is wise public policy to weigh the interests involved and to give deserving people a chance to live life free from the stigma and disadvantages associated with a criminal record, particularly when the offenses are over thirty years old. The individual, government, and society all benefit when the individual can have enhanced employment opportunities, serve as better role models, and contribute more as productive citizens and parents.

In State v. Auge, 10th Dist. No. 01AP-1272, 2002-Ohio-3061, the court dealt with an application to seal the record of conviction under R.C. 2953.32, and noted as follows:

{¶ 23} Case law interpreting this statute makes it abundantly clear that it is remedial in nature, and “must be liberally construed” to promote the statute's purpose of allowing appropriate applicants to seal their records. State ex rel. Gains v. Rossi (1999), 86 Ohio St.3d 620, 716 N.E.2d 204. See, also, State v. Hilbert (2001), 145 Ohio App.3d 824, 764 N.E.2d 1064; In the Matter of: M.B. (2000), Franklin App. No. 99AP-922.

In State v. M.D., 8th Dist. No. 92534, 2009-Ohio-5694, the court noted:

{¶ 9} “The expungement provisions are remedial in nature and ‘must be liberally construed to promote their purposes.’ ” Id., quoting State ex rel. Gains v. Rossi, 86 Ohio St.3d 620, 622, 716 N.E.2d 204, 1999-Ohio-213.

In State v. M. D., supra, the court noted at ¶ 8, that, “In enacting the expungement provisions, the legislature recognized that ‘people make mistakes, but that afterwards they regret their conduct and are older, wiser, and sadder. The enactment and amendment of R.C. 2953.31 and 2953.32 is, in a way, a manifestation of the traditional Western civilization concepts of sin, punishment, atonement, and forgiveness.” In State v. Dzama, 9th Dist. No. 25404, 2011-Ohio-2634, ¶ 8, the court held:

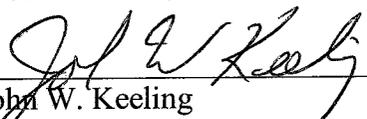

“[T]he remedial expungement provisions of R.C. 2953.32 and 2953.33 must be liberally construed to promote their purposes.” State ex rel. Gains v. Rossi (1999), 86 Ohio St.3d 620, 622. The purpose of the statute, moreover, is to “provide remedial relief to qualified offenders in order to facilitate the prompt transition of these individuals into meaningful and productive roles.” Barker v. State (1980), 62 Ohio St.2d 35, 41.

The constitutional provision providing for a pardon serves the same purpose as the expungement statutes. It gives people like the appellant a second chance. It creates a reward to those who spend decades earning atonement. The proper exercise of a pardon is an act of justice that is provided for in our Constitution. It is good public policy and it is just to give people, such as the appellant, the opportunity to start over again after decades of living a virtuous and law-abiding life. The supreme law of Ohio provides for pardons and it is the duty of the courts to honor a pardon when it is granted by sealing the records and treating the conviction as if it had never occurred. If courts have the inherent power to seal records in the interests of justice, then the interests of justice warrant the sealing of the records in this case.

In conclusion, it should be pointed out that the Ohio statutes do not expunge convictions even though that term is often used to describe the process. Ohio statutes call for a sealing of the records and this is a big difference. This means that the fact of the convictions would no longer be available for public dissemination but that the record would still exist for law enforcement purposes and certain employment considerations. Sealed records can be used in sentencing for another offense and in connection with certain applications for employment. R.C. 2953.32(D) The trial court below ordered the records to be sealed. This was a proper remedy based upon the fact that the appellee has received a pardon from the governor for his old crimes. Had the trial court failed to order the records sealed, he would have done so in derogation of the governor's power to pardon and the trial court would have rendered the pardon, lawfully granted by the governor, ineffective and useless.

CONCLUSION

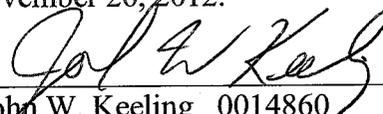

This case involves matters of public and great general interest and substantial constitutional questions. The appellant requests that this court grant jurisdiction so that the important issues raised herein can be reviewed on the merits.

APPEAL from the Franklin County Court of Common Pleas.

BRYANT, J.

{¶1} Plaintiff-appellant, State of Ohio, appeals from a judgment of the Franklin County Court of Common Pleas granting the application of defendant-appellee, James A. Radcliff, to seal the record of his prior convictions. Because defendant does not satisfy the criteria for either judicial or statutory expungement, we reverse.

I. Facts and Procedural History

{¶2} On September 13, 2011, defendant filed an application requesting the trial court seal the record of his convictions for breaking and entering and passing bad checks in case No. 81CR-4506. The record indicates that between 1973 and 1981, in addition to the convictions in 81CR-4506, defendant was convicted of several crimes throughout Ohio, including felonious assault, aiding escape, disorderly conduct, and complicity to commit theft.

{¶3} According to the letters from friends, co-workers, and family members submitted to support defendant's application to seal his record, defendant significantly reversed his behavior and became a productive, law-abiding member of society in the 30 years since defendant's youthful legal troubles. Defendant applied for a custodial position with Dublin City Schools, indicating on the application that he had a criminal background that he was willing to discuss with his prospective employer. Defendant successfully obtained the position and eventually became the lead custodian at Dublin Jerome High School. Defendant married and supported his disabled wife, their child, and his wife's four children from a previous marriage and also became an active member in his church. After 21 years of what appeared to be exemplary service with Dublin City Schools, defendant was fired from his job when a local newspaper published an article noting the criminal records of some school employees.

{¶4} On January 7, 2011, Governor Ted Strickland granted defendant "a full and absolute pardon" for defendant's various convictions, indicating defendant had "been rehabilitated and ha[d] assumed the responsibilities of citizenship." (R. 1-2.) Defendant then filed his application, indicating he was not seeking the order for any of the reasons listed in R.C. 2953.52 but rather because he possessed a pardon. The state objected to the application, noting defendant was ineligible to have his record sealed under either R.C. 2953.52 or 2953.31.

{¶5} The trial court held a hearing on defendant's application on July 7, 2011. The court found the circumstances of the case "a little bit * * * unusual" but concluded the pardon entitled defendant to "a full release." (Tr. 3, 5.) The court issued a judgment entry on July 20, 2011 sealing the record of defendant's conviction pursuant to R.C. 2953.32, noting defendant had no criminal actions pending against him, and concluding that sealing his record was consistent with the public interest.

II. Assignments of Error

{¶6} The state appeals, assigning two errors:

FIRST ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR

THE TRIAL COURT ERRED WHEN IT FAILED TO DETERMINE WHETHER APPLICANT WAS A "FIRST OFFENDER" AS REQUIRED BY R.C. 2953.32.

SECOND ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR

THE TRIAL COURT ERRED IN EXERCISING ITS JURISDICTION WHEN IT GRANTED APPLICANT'S APPLICATION FOR EXPUNGEMENT AS APPLICANT WAS NOT A "FIRST OFFENDER" AS DEFINED BY R.C. 2953.31.

The state's assignments of error are interrelated and will be addressed together.

III. Expungement: Statutory v. Judicial

{¶7} " 'Expungement is a post-conviction relief proceeding which grants a limited number of convicted persons the privilege of having record of their first conviction sealed.' " Koehler v. State, 10th Dist. No. 07AP-913, 2008-Ohio-3472, ¶ 12, quoting State v. Smith, 3d Dist. No. 9-04-05, 2004-Ohio-6668, ¶ 9. Neither the United States nor Ohio Constitutions endows one convicted of a crime with a substantive right to have the record of a conviction expunged. Koehler at ¶ 14, quoting State v. Gerber, 8th Dist. No. 87351, 2006-Ohio-5328, ¶ 9. "Rather, ' "[e]xpungement is an act of grace created by the state" and so is a privilege, not a right.' " Koehler, quoting State v. Simon, 87 Ohio St.3d 531, 533 (2000), quoting State v. Hamilton, 75 Ohio St.3d 636, 639 (1996).

{¶8} R.C. 2953.52(A) permits any person who has been found not guilty by a jury, who is the defendant named in a dismissed indictment, or against whom the Grand Jury enters a no bill, to apply to the court for an order sealing the official records of the case. R.C. 2953.32(A)(1) permits a first offender to apply to the sentencing court for an order sealing the record of conviction. A first offender is "anyone who has been convicted of an offense in this state or any other jurisdiction and who previously or subsequently has not been convicted of the same or a different offense in this state or any other jurisdiction." R.C. 2953.31(A).

{¶9} Under either section, the court must determine if the prosecutor filed an objection to the application and, if so, consider the prosecutor's reasons for the objection. R.C. 2953.32(B); R.C. 2953.52(B); Koehler at ¶ 13. The court also must weigh the applicant's interests in having the records sealed against the legitimate needs, if any, of the government to maintain the records. R.C. 2953.32(C)(1); R.C. 2953.52(B)(2)(d). If the applicant fails to satisfy any one of the statutory requirements, the court must deny the application. Id. at ¶ 13, citing State v. Krantz, 8th Dist. No. 82439, 2003-Ohio-4568, ¶ 23. None of the applicable statutes permits a defendant to seek expungement after obtaining a gubernatorial pardon, and defendant acknowledges he is not entitled to expungement under either statutory provision.

{¶10} Indeed, defendant sought to seal his records comprising case No. 81CR-4506 based on the pardon he received for those convictions, not the statutory provisions, and the trial court concluded the pardon defendant received, not the statutes, provided the court with authority to seal the record. Similarly, amicus curiae admits the trial court "had no authority to order the record of conviction sealed pursuant to the[] statutory provisions" but instead relied on the proposition that "trial court ha[d] the inherent power to order its records sealed in the interests of justice." (Amicus' brief, 3.)

{¶11} The seminal case defendant cites to support the trial court's decision is Pepper Pike v. Doe, 66 Ohio St.2d 374 (1981), stating a court may order a record of conviction sealed "where such unusual and exceptional circumstances make it appropriate to exercise jurisdiction over the matter." Id. at paragraph two of the syllabus. "When exercising this power, the court should use a balancing test which weighs the privacy interest of the defendant against the government's legitimate need to maintain records of criminal proceedings." Id.; see also State v. Davidson, 10th Dist. No. 02AP-665, 2003-Ohio-1448, ¶ 15 (stating the enactment of R.C. 2953.31 et seq. did not abrogate the judicial remedy of expungement).

{¶12} In Pepper Pike, the charges against the defendant arose out of a domestic quarrel where the complaining witness used the court as "a vindictive tool to harass [the defendant]." Id. at 377. After the city dismissed the charges, the defendant filed a motion seeking to expunge the record of arrest. Id. at 375. At the time, the General Assembly had not enacted R.C. 2953.52, and the defendant had no statutory basis under which to seek expungement.

{¶13} Finding the circumstances of the case "unusual and exceptional," the court determined the defendant was entitled to expungement based on her "constitutional right to privacy." Id. at 377, citing Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); Wisconsin v. Constantineau, 400 U.S. 433 (1971); Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965). The court warned, however, that the case before it was "the exceptional case, and should not be construed to be a carte blanche for every defendant acquitted of criminal charges in Ohio courts." Pepper Pike at 377 (observing that when courts exercise the judicial remedy of expungement they should "follow the guidelines set out in Ohio's criminal expungement statute").

{¶14} The "extra-statutory" authority to grant the expungement described in Pepper Pike derived "out of a concern for the preservation of the privacy interest," and courts have contrasted the facts and holding of Pepper Pike "with the case of adjudicated offenders, whose relief is prescribed by statute." (Emphasis sic.) State v. Weber, 19 Ohio App.3d 214, 216 (1st Dist.1983). Although Pepper Pike determined trial courts have jurisdiction to expunge the records of a criminal case "where the charges are dismissed with prejudice prior to trial by the party initiating the proceedings," it also observed that "[i]n Ohio, convicted first offenders may seek expungement and sealing of their criminal records under the authority of R.C. 2953.32." Id. at paragraph one of the syllabus; 376.

{¶15} Thus, "where a defendant has been convicted of an offense, expungement may be granted only as allowed by statute, and the court may not use the judicial (i.e., extra-statutory) expungement remedy used in Pepper Pike." State v. Bailey, 10th Dist. No. 02AP-406, 2002-Ohio-6740, ¶ 11. As a result, "[t]he only remedy for a convicted defendant is expungement through the statute." Id. at ¶ 12. See also In re Barnes, 10th Dist. No. 05AP-355, 2005-Ohio-6891, ¶ 14 (noting that because appellee had a previous conviction, "the judicial remedy of expungement [was] unavailable to appellee"); Davidson at ¶ 16 (determining that while "[e]xceptional circumstances demonstrating appellee's good character were indeed present under these facts, * * * because appellee was actually convicted of the charge she seeks to have expunged, she [could not] qualify for a judicial expungement"); State v. Blank, 10th Dist. No. 04AP-341, 2005-Ohio-2642, ¶ 11 (deciding that "because appellee was convicted of a crime and not just acquitted or had his case dismissed, appellee cannot qualify for judicial expungement); Weber at 217 (concluding the holding of Pepper Pike was "clearly and obviously" directed toward "instances of defendants acquitted of criminal charges") (Emphasis sic.); State v. Netter, 64 Ohio App.3d 322, 325-26 (4th Dist.1989) (noting "a number of cases which have limited Pepper Pike to cases involving no conviction" and concluding that "[b]ecause appellee was convicted, his only remedy was statutory"); State v. Kidd, 11th Dist. No. 2004-P-0047, 2005-Ohio-2079, ¶ 12 (stating that "[i]n Ohio, appellate courts, including this one, have uniformly limited this remedy [of judicial expungement] to cases where the person seeking expung[e]ment was not convicted of an offense"); State v. Fowler, 12th Dist. No. CA2001-03-005 (Sept. 24, 2001) (concluding that "because appellant was convicted, his only remedy was statutory"); State v. Chiaverini, 6th Dist. No. L-00-1306 (Mar. 16, 2001) (stating that "although the judicial power to grant an expungement request still exists, * * * it is limited to cases where the accused has been acquitted or exonerated in some way and protection of the accused's privacy interest is paramount to prevent injustice").

{¶16} None of the above cited cases concerned a defendant convicted and subsequently pardoned by the governor, but the cases suggest trial courts retain inherent jurisdiction to expunge or seal criminal records only where the defendant has not been convicted of the underlying offense. The issue in this case then resolves to whether the governor's absolute pardon erased defendant's conviction and entitled defendant to invoke the court's inherent jurisdiction to judicially expunge his record in order to protect his constitutional right to privacy.

IV. The Effect of a Pardon

A. Ohio's Pardon Jurisprudence

{¶17} The Ohio Constitution grants the governor the "power, after conviction, to grant reprieves, commutations, and pardons, for all crimes and offenses, except treason and cases of impeachment, upon such conditions as the governor may think proper; subject, however, to such regulations, as to the manner of applying for commutations and pardons, as may be prescribed by law." Ohio Constitution, Article III, Section 11. Article III, Section 11 "was adopted as part of extensive revisions to the Constitution made in 1851." State ex rel. Maurer v. Sheward, 71 Ohio St.3d 513, 517 (1994). The only limits on the clemency power are those that Article III, Section 11 authorizes. Id. at 518. The General Assembly may not interfere with the discretion of the governor in exercising the clemency power, and the governor's exercise of discretion in using the clemency power is not subject to judicial review. Id.

{¶18} In 1883, the Supreme Court of Ohio explained that a pardon is, "in effect, a reversal of the judgment, a verdict of acquittal, and a judgment of discharge thereon," creating a "complete estoppel of record against further punishment pursuant to such conviction." Knapp v. Thomas, 39 Ohio St. 377, 381 (1883). Relying on United States Supreme Court precedent, Knapp held that " 'a pardon reaches both the punishment prescribed for the offense and the guilt of the offender, * * * 'obliterates, in legal contemplation, the offense itself,' " and " 'so far blots out the offense, that afterwards it cannot be imputed to him to prevent the assertion of his legal rights.' " Id., quoting Ex Parte Garland, 71 U.S. 333, 380 (1866); Carlisle v. U.S., 83 U.S. 147, 151 (1872); Knote v. U.S., 95 U.S. 149 (1877). See also State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Peters, 43 Ohio St. 629, 650 (1885) (stating that a full and absolute pardon "releases the offender from the entire punishment prescribed for his offense, and from all the disabilities consequent on his conviction").

{¶19} In State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Hawkins, 44 Ohio St. 98, 117 (1886), the court clarified its holding in Knapp, stating that "[w]hatever the theory of the law may be as to the effect of a pardon, it cannot work such moral changes as to warrant the assertion that a pardoned convict is just as reliable as one who has constantly maintained the character of a good citizen." In Hawkins, the defendant police commissioners defended their choice of police officers, some of whom were "gamblers; * * * ha[d] served terms in the workhouse, * * * ha[d] been keepers of houses of prostitution, and a number of whom ha[d] been discharged by said board for drunkenness;" they claimed at least some of the officers had been pardoned and "thereby restored to citizenship and entitled to the same confidence as if they had never been convicted." Id. at 98, 116-17. Hawkins called it "a perversion of language to give to the views expressed by Judge Okey in Knapp v. Thomas, 39 Ohio St. 377, such a construction. He never meant anything of the kind." Id. at 117.

{¶20} In a later case that considered whether a probation department interfered with the governor's pardoning power, the court explained that "[a] full pardon purges away all guilt and leaves the recipient from a legal standpoint, in the same condition as if the crime had never been committed." State ex rel. Gordon v. Zangerle, 136 Ohio St. 371, 376 (1940), citing Knapp at 381. Thus, probation could not interfere with the governor's pardoning power, as an absolute pardon would "set[] the accused free from the custody of the law, * * * terminate[] existing probation and make[] anticipated probation impossible." Id.; see also State v. Morris, 55 Ohio St.2d 101, 105 (1978), citing Knapp at 381 (holding that "a full pardon not only results in a remission of the punishment and the guilt, but also a remission of the crime itself").

{¶21} More recently, two Ohio appellate courts considered the effect a gubernatorial pardon on the recipient's ability to seek expungement of the pardoned offense. In State v. Cope, 111 Ohio App.3d 309 (1st Dist.1996), the court, observing trial courts have inherent powers to seal records pursuant to Pepper Pike, stated that while a factual distinction could be "drawn between a person who has charges dismissed with prejudice and a person who is convicted and receives a pardon, that distinction is immaterial, because the pardon places the recipient, from a legal standpoint, in the same condition as if the crime had never been committed." (Emphasis sic.) Id. at 311, citing Gordon. The court held that granting a pardon "is an 'exceptional and unusual' circumstance" entitling the trial court to seal the record of conviction, "regardless of whether the petitioner has other offenses on his record. 'A pardon without expungement is not a pardon.'" Id. at 312, quoting Commonwealth v. C.S., 517 Pa. 89 (1987).

{¶22} By contrast, State v. Boykin, 9th Dist. No. 25752, 2012-Ohio-1381, concluded that, although trial courts have "authority to grant judicial expungement in situations in which an executive pardon is at issue," a pardon does not "conclusively entitle the recipient to have the record sealed." Id. at ¶ 7, 13. The court noted a careful reading of Knapp revealed that "a pardoned individual is 'a new man' insofar as the restoration of competency and the further imposition of punishment are concerned," but that the pardon "does not wipe away all traces of the criminal case." Id. at ¶ 10. Reviewing case law from various states and the federal courts, the court decided a "majority of courts that have considered the question" concluded a pardon does not entitle the recipient to have their record of conviction sealed. Id. at ¶ 13. The Boykin court further found its holding correct because, "[i]n Ohio, the legislature has not provided for sealing records of a pardoned individual by statute" as "[s]ome other jurisdictions have." Id. at ¶ 14.

{¶23} Thus, the two Ohio appellate courts to recently consider the effect of a pardon on the recipient's ability to seek expungement have reached differing conclusions regarding the proper effect of a pardon. Knapp is at the root of the pardon jurisprudence in Ohio and based its understanding of the power to pardon on the United States Supreme Court holdings in Garland, Knote, and Carlisle.

B. United States Supreme Court's Pardon Jurisprudence

1. Ex Parte Garland

{¶24} In Ex Parte Garland, the U.S. Supreme Court explained that a pardon "blots out of existence the guilt, so that in the eye of the law the offender is as innocent as if he had never committed the offence." Id. at 380. Garland was an Arkansas attorney admitted to practice before the United States Supreme Court prior to the civil war. Id. at 336. Following the war, Congress passed an act requiring any person seeking to practice before a court of the United States to take an oath affirming that he neither took up arms against the United States nor aided the Confederacy. Id. at 334-35. Because Garland represented Arkansas in the Confederate Congress, he could not take the oath. Id. at 336. Garland received a presidential pardon in 1865 for offenses he committed by taking part in the rebellion, presented the pardon to the court, and requested that he be admitted to practice without having to take the oath. Id. at 336-37.

{¶25} The court agreed with Garland's assertion that the act was unconstitutional, concluding the act was "of the nature of bills of pains and penalties" and thus "subject to the constitutional inhibition against the passage of bills of attainder." Id. at 377. The court also determined the act violated the constitutional prohibition against ex post facto laws, as it "impose[d] a punishment for some of the acts specified which were not punishable at the time they were committed, and for other of the acts it add[ed] a new punishment to that before prescribed." Id. at 377.

{¶26} After finding the act unconstitutional, the court stated its conclusion was "strengthened by a consideration of the effect of the pardon produced by the petitioner."

Id. at 380. The court explained that "[a] pardon reaches both the punishment prescribed for the offence and the guilt of the offender," releasing the offender from punishment, "blot[ting] out of existence the guilt" and rendering the offender "as innocent as if he had never committed the offence." Id. at 380. When granted after conviction, the pardon "removes the penalties and disabilities, and restores him to all his civil rights; it makes him, as it were, a new man, and gives him a new credit and capacity." Id. at 380-81. The court acknowledged, however, that a pardon would not "restore offices forfeited, or property or interests vested in others in consequence of the conviction and judgment." Id. at 381. In the end, due to the pardon, the oath "could not be exacted, even if that act were not subject to any other objection than the one thus stated." Id.

{¶27} Modern case law has dismissed the "blotting out" language from Garland as dictum and rejected Garland's expansive view of the power to pardon. See In re Abrams, 689 A.2d 6, 17 (D.C.App.1997) (noting that "[b]y the time Justice Field reached the issue of the pardon, the case had already been decided[,] * * * the statute was deemed invalid on other constitutional grounds"); Bjerkan v. U.S., 529 F.2d 125, 128 (7th Cir.1975), fn.2 (noting "[a] pardon does not 'blot out guilt' nor does it restore the offender to a state of innocence in the eye of the law as was suggested in Ex Parte Garland"); In re North, 62 F.3d 1434, 1437 (D.C.Cir.1994) (concluding the Supreme Court "did not rest its judgment [in Garland] on the theory that the pardon blotted out Garland's guilt," and that "expansive view of the effect of a pardon turned out to be dictum"); State v. Skinner, 632 A.2d 82, 84 (Del.1993) (noting that "[w]hile the U.S. Supreme Court, in Ex Parte Garland, * * * stated that a full pardon 'releases the punishment and blots out the existence of guilt, so that in the eye of the law the offender is as innocent as if he had never committed the offense,' that dictum has since been rejected"); Hirschberg v. Commodity Futures Trading Comm., 414 F.3d 679, 682 (7th Cir.2005) (dismissing Hirschberg's reliance on Garland, noting that "modern caselaw emphasizes * * * that this historical language was dicta and is inconsistent with current law"); U.S. v. Noonan, 906 F.2d 952, 958 (3d Cir.1990) (noting the Supreme Court, by 1915, "made clear that it was not accepting the Garland dictum that a pardon 'blots out of existence the guilt' ").

{¶28} "While the U.S. Supreme Court has never expressly overruled Garland, since that decision the Court has eroded its broad articulation of the power by narrowing its scope in Angle v. Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway Co., 151 U.S. 1 * * * (1894), Burdick v. United States, 236 U.S. 79 * * * (1915), and Carlesi v. New York, 233 U.S. 51 * * * (1914)." In re Sang Man Shin, 125 Nev. 100, 105 (Nev.2009). "In Angle, the Court held that a third-party civil right of action to recover damages remains regardless of a pardon." Id., citing Angle at 19. In Carlesi, the Supreme Court determined a court applying a habitual offender statute could consider "past offenses committed by the accused as a circumstance of aggravation, even although for such past offenses there had been a pardon granted." Id. at 59. See Abrams at 18 (stating "[t]he result in Carlesi cannot be reconciled with the notion that the presidential pardon 'blot[ted] out' of existence the conduct that led to Carlesi's federal conviction").

{¶29} In Burdick, the court similarly departed from Garland's view, holding instead that a pardon "carries an imputation of guilt; acceptance a confession of it." Id. at 94. Burdick refused to answer questions before a Grand Jury regarding his sources for a newspaper article, and the state procured a presidential pardon for Burdick, hoping the pardon would induce Burdick to testify. Id. at 85. Burdick refused to accept the pardon and refused to answer the questions. Id. at 86. The court first determined a pardon may be "rejected by the person to whom it is tendered" and a court may not force the pardon on the unwilling recipient. Id. at 90. The court then explained why someone would reject a pardon, stating an individual may wish to "escape [the] confession of guilt implied in the acceptance of a pardon * * *, —preferring to be the victim of the law rather than its acknowledged transgressor." Id. at 90-91. See also North at 1437, citing Burdick at 91 (noting Burdick, "which recognized that the acceptance of a pardon implies a confession of guilt," implicitly rejected Garland's dictum).

2. Carlisle v. U.S. and Knote v. U.S.

{¶30} The other two cases Knapp relied on, Carlisle and Knote, both concerned claims for reimbursement for property the United States government seized and sold during the Civil War. Although both cases rely on Garland's interpretation of the pardoning power, each case also qualifies the power, acknowledging that a pardon does not erase past conduct.

{¶31} In Carlisle, the claimants sought recovery under the Captured and Abandoned Property Act for cotton the United States Navy seized and sold during the Civil War. Id. at 148. Although the claimants aided the rebellion by selling saltpetre to the Confederate Army, rendering them unable to recover under the terms of the act, they presented the court with a presidential pardon which "obliterate[d] in legal contemplation the offence itself." Id. at 149, 151. The Supreme Court held that, while "the pardon and amnesty do not and cannot alter the actual fact that aid and comfort were given by the claimants, * * * they forever close the eyes of the court to the perception of that fact as an element in its judgment, no rights of third parties having intervened." Id. at 151.

{¶32} In Knote, the claimant sought reimbursement for his land confiscated and sold during the war, the proceeds of which were paid into the United States Treasury. Id. at 152. The claimant received a pardon for his participation in the rebellion, and the Supreme Court noted that, while a pardon "so far blots out the offence, that afterwards it cannot be imputed to him to prevent the assertion of his legal rights[,] * * * it does not make amends for the past." Id. at 153. Because the pardoned offense has been "established by judicial proceedings, that which has been done or suffered while they were in force is presumed to have been rightfully done and justly suffered, and no satisfaction for it can be required." Id. at 154. Because the rights to the property had vested in the buyer and the monies from the sale deposited into the United States Treasury, the court concluded the claimant was not entitled to reimbursement from the sale. Id.

{¶33} Given the facts of the cases on which it relied, Knapp's foundation for holding that a pardon blots out the offense and operates as a verdict of acquittal is problematic. Carlisle and Knote both indicate that a pardon cannot erase past conduct, and recent case law dismisses Garland's broad articulation of a pardon as dictum.

C. Ancillary Authority on the Effect of a Pardon

{¶34} By 1915, the debate over the proper interpretation and effect to be given a pardon had become so heated that Professor Williston wrote his seminal article: Samuel Williston, Does a Pardon Blot Out Guilt?, 28 Harv.L.Rev. 647 (1915). Williston noted the "often quoted" language from Garland and concluded that, "when it is said that in the eye of the law [pardoned convicts] are as innocent as if they had never committed an offence, the natural rejoinder is, then the eyesight of the law is very bad." Id. at 647-48. Williston analyzed English and United States case law and commentaries, concluding "[t]he true line of distinction seems to be this: The pardon removes all legal punishment for the offence," thus removing any legal disqualifications which may flow from the offense, but "if character is a necessary qualification and the commission of a crime would disqualify even though there had been no criminal prosecution for the crime, the fact that the criminal has been convicted and pardoned does not make him any more eligible." Id. at 653.

{¶35} Williston's comments about the effect of a pardon upon character have been followed widely in various contexts. Many courts have determined an attorney, suspended or disbarred after committing a crime, is not entitled to reinstatement upon receiving a pardon for the underlying conviction, since disbarment "is not a part of the punishment inflicted for the commission of the crime" but rather takes away the acquired right "because of misconduct." Branch v. State, 120 Fla. 666, 670 (1935). See, e.g., State v. Snyder, 136 Fla. 875 (1939) (noting the "very fact of embezzlement is cause for disbarment and a pardon does not blot out that fact"); Grossgold v. Supreme Ct of Illinois, 557 F.2d 122, 125-26 (7th Cir.1977); In re Beck, 264 Ind. 141, 146 (1976), quoting In re Lavine, 2 Cal.2d 324, 329 (1935); Abrams at 15, quoting In re Harrington, 134 Vt. 549, 555 (1976).

{¶36} Cases concerning other types of professional licenses similarly conclude that a pardon will not erase the historical fact of a conviction or render its recipient morally fit for admission to the profession. See Stone v. Oklahoma Real Estate Comm., 369 P.2d 642, 646 (Okla.1962) (concluding, for purposes of considering Stone's fitness to become a real estate broker, the pardon did not remove the stigma of Stone's prior convictions, and "[i]n [the court's] opinion a pardon simply does not 'wipe the slate clean'"); Sandlin v. Criminal Justice Standards & Training Comm., 531 So.2d 1344, 1345-46 (Fla.1988) (holding that although a "pardon removes all disabilities resulting from a crime[,] * * * [p]ersons seeking to practice certain professions or employments, * * * can be required to demonstrate their good moral character, even though they may have been fully pardoned for previous crimes").

{¶37} "Thus, while a pardon will foreclose punishment of the offense itself, it does not erase the fact that the offense occurred, and that fact may later be used to the pardonee's detriment." Fletcher v. Graham, 192 S.W.3d 350, 363 (Ky.2006). See also Talarico v. Dunlap, 177 Ill.2d 185, 190 (1997) (concluding that because a pardon does not "obliterate the fact of the commission of the crime and the conviction thereof[,] * * * Talarico's pardon did not negate the fact of his criminal conviction for purposes of collateral estoppel"); North, at 1438 (noting the pardon did "not blot out guilt or expunge the indictment," and "George's disability—the fact of his indictment—remain[ed], preventing the court from awarding him attorney's fees").

D. The Effect of a Pardon on Expungement

{¶38} Prior to the First District's ruling in Cope, two other courts had held a pardon entitled its recipient to record expunction. In C.S., the court, noting a pardon "*blots out the very existence of * * * guilt*," concluded "[t]here [was] no way that the state [could] retain the record of a former criminal who is 'as innocent as if he had never committed the offense.'" (Emphasis sic.) Id. at 92-93, quoting Commonwealth v. Sutley, 474 Pa. 256, 273-74 (1977). The court held that "[a] pardon without expungement is not a pardon." Id. at 93. Cf. Skinner at 86 (concluding C.S.'s holding, that a pardon without expungement is not a pardon, was "inexact because a pardon without expungement is clearly significant in that it restores civil rights that may have been lost").

{¶39} In State v. Bergman, 558 N.E.2d 1111 (Ind.App.1990), an Indiana appellate court concluded a gubernatorial pardon entitled its recipient to expungement. Although Bergman relied on Garland and C.S. to find the expungement proper, the court also noted that the pardon at issue specifically stated it was granted to enhance Bergman's career opportunities " 'and to clear his name.' " (Emphasis sic.) Id. at 1114. To carry out the executive mandate, "the court had no choice but to 'clear his name' by expunging the record of Bergman's conviction." Id. Cf. Blake v. State, 860 N.E.2d 625, 631 (Ind.App.2007) (noting "a majority of the case law from [Indiana's] sister states rejects the original principles drawn from Ex parte Garland and indicate[s] that a pardon does not entitle the pardonee to expunction of all criminal records," so that even though the trial court had to expunge the record of defendant's conviction pursuant to Bergman, it did not have to expunge the arrest records).

{¶40} The majority of courts to consider the issue hold that a pardon does not entitle its recipient to records expungement. R.J.L. v. State, 887 So.2d 1268, 1279 (Fla.2004) (deciding that of the "nine jurisdictions [to] have directly addressed whether a pardon entitles an individual to records expunction," the majority "held that a pardoned individual is not entitled to records expunction"). R.J.L. addressed whether a pardon "eliminate[d] [the defendant's] adjudication of guilt, so as to entitle him to a certificate of eligibility for records expunction" under the Florida expungement statute. Id. at 1271. The court observed that, although "a pardon has the effect of removing punishment and disabilities, and restoring civil rights[,] * * * the denial of records expunction does not constitute a punishment" and "eligibility for records expunction is not a civil right restored by the grant of a gubernatorial pardon." Id. at 1280. The court thus concluded that "[a] pardon does not eliminate the adjudication of guilt, creating a fiction that the crime never occurred." Id.

{¶41} In Noonan, the Third Circuit similarly addressed whether a pardon would directly or indirectly expunge a judicial branch record of a criminal conviction. The court explained that the pardoning power was "an executive prerogative of mercy, not of judicial record-keeping" and determined the notion that the president has the ability to tamper with judicial records flew "in the face of the separation of powers doctrine." Id. at 955-56. See also Ashley M. Steiner, Remission of Guilt or Removal of Punishment? The Effects of a Presidential Pardon, 46 Emory L.J. 959 (1997) (noting that, if the presidential pardoning power functions as a check on the judicial power to fix judgments, "acceptance of the view that a pardon obliterates guilt and the fact of conviction would usurp th[e] judicial power" to decide cases and impose punishments, thus "counteracting the balancing function of a pardon and resulting in a power in the executive that itself must be checked"); Nixon v. U.S., 506 U.S. 224, 232 (1993), quoting Black's Law Dictionary 1113 (6th Ed.1990) (stating that "a pardon is in no sense an overturning of a judgment of conviction by some other tribunal" but "is '[a]n executive action that mitigates or sets aside punishment for a crime' "). (Emphasis sic.)

{¶42} Reviewing varying authorities, Noonan determined a presidential pardon could not " 'create any factual fiction' that Noonan's conviction had not occurred" as would "justify expunction of his criminal court record." Id. at 960. See also Bjerkan at 126 (holding a pardon "cannot erase the basic fact of conviction, nor can it wipe away the social stigma that a conviction inflicts"); State v. Blanchard, 100 S.W.3d 226, 230-31 (Tenn.Crim.App.2002) (concluding the pardon did not render the defendant as though never convicted and noting "[n]umerous state courts have also recognized that a pardon does not eradicate the underlying conviction but rather releases the defendant from further punishment"); Skinner at 85 (stating that "[w]hile the pardon may have forgiven his conviction, it did not obliterate the public memory of the offense"); People v. Thon, 319 Ill.App.3d 855, 861 (2001) (concluding "petitioner's pardon did not erase his convictions" but "merely served to release petitioner from further punishment," so that petitioner was "an individual previously convicted of a criminal offense" and "ineligible for expungement"); State v. Bachman, 675 S.W.2d 41, 51-52 (Mo.App.1984) (deciding that while a "pardon gives new effect to the criminal conviction of a defendant, * * * a pardon does not grant authority to close or expunge criminal records"); Commonwealth v. Vickey, 381 Mass. 762, 769 (1980), quoting Commissioner of Metropolitan Dist. Comm. v. Dir. of Civil Serv., 348 Mass. 184, 194 (1964) (stating that " 'even if a pardon may remit all penal consequences of a criminal conviction, it cannot obliterate the acts which constituted the crime' "); Abrams at 7 (determining that "although the presidential pardon set aside Abrams' convictions, as well as the consequences which the law attaches to those convictions, it could not and did not require the court to close its eyes to the fact that Abrams did what he did"); U.S. v. Smith, 841 F.2d 1127 (6th Cir.1988) (unpublished disposition), citing U.S. v. Doe, 556 F.2d 391, 392 (6th Cir.1977) (concluding the petitioner's reliance on Garland was misplaced, as "[a] presidential pardon restores the offender's civil rights, but, as this court has recognized, a presidential pardon does not require the expungement of a criminal conviction"); U.S. Dept. of Justice, Office of Legal Counsel, Whether a Presidential Pardon Expunges Judicial and Executive Branch Records of a Crime (Aug. 11, 2006), available at <http://www.justice.gov/olc/memoranda-opinions.html> (accessed September 27, 2012) (stating that while "a presidential pardon removes, either conditionally or unconditionally, the punitive legal consequences that would otherwise flow from conviction for the pardoned offense," a pardon "does not erase the conviction as a historical fact or justify the fiction that the pardoned individual did not engage in criminal conduct").

{¶43} More recently, states have continued to conclude a pardon does not erase the underlying conviction or entitle the recipient to have his or her criminal record expunged. See Harscher v. Commonwealth, 327 S.W.3d 519, 522 (Ky.App.2010) (holding that "while a full pardon has the effect of removing all legal punishment for the offense and restoring one's civil rights, * * * [b]ecause a pardon does not erase the fact that the individual was convicted * * * a pardon does not entitle an individual to expungement of his criminal record"); Sang Man Shin at 101, 110 (concluding "the pardoning power does not bequeath innocence or erase the historical fact of the underlying criminal act and conviction," and, although "a pardon is an act of forgiveness that restores civil rights," nothing in the "Nevada Constitution * * * create[d] a civil right to expunge a criminal record"). Notably, no recent case has adopted the reasoning of C.S., Bergman, or Cope, which concluded a pardon entitles its recipient to expungement.

E. Ohio Statutes Addressing Pardons

{¶44} In People v. Glisson, 69 Ill.2d 502, 506 (1978), the Supreme Court of Illinois concluded that the "effects of a pardon are not unlimited," as the legislature "explicitly provided in certain areas for rights and benefits to the pardonee beyond those afforded by the granting of the pardon." As an example, the court cited to an Illinois statute which "restored the right to hold public office to certain pardoned persons." Id., citing Ill.Rev.Stat.1975, Chapter 46, par. 29-15.

{¶45} In Ohio, the General Assembly also enacted statutes delineating the rights and benefits restored to a pardonee. R.C. 2967.01(B) defines a pardon as "the remission of penalty by the governor in accordance with the power vested in the governor by the constitution." A pardon "relieves the person to whom it is granted of all disabilities arising out of the conviction or convictions from which it is granted." R.C. 2967.04(B).

{¶46} Although a pardon returns to a felon the right to be an elector or juror and to hold an office of honor, trust, or profit, a pardoned felon remains incompetent to circulate a petition. R.C. 2961.01(A), (B). Despite the civil rights returned to a pardoned felon, the pardon does "not release the person from the costs of a conviction in this state, unless so specified." R.C. 2961.01(A)(2). Compare Williston, 28 Harv. L. Rev. at 658 (stating that "[i]f one who has paid a fine on conviction of crime and is subsequently pardoned, is indeed an innocent man, or is to be so regarded by the law, he should have the fine which he has paid returned to him"). See also Evid.R. 609(C) (providing that "[e]vidence of a conviction is not admissible under this rule if (1) the conviction has been the subject of a pardon * * *, and that person has not been convicted of a subsequent crime which was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year"); Boykin at ¶ 11, citing R.C. 2923.14(C) (noting that "[a] pardon does not automatically remove the recipient's disability with respect to carrying a concealed weapon").

{¶47} The Ohio Constitution and the Revised Code require a record of both the pardon and the corresponding conviction. The governor must "communicate to the general assembly, at every regular session, each case of * * * pardon granted, stating the name and crime of the convict, the sentence, its date, and the date of the * * * pardon, * * * with the Governor's reasons therefor." Ohio Constitution, Article III, Section 11. See also R.C. 107.10(E) (requiring the governor to keep a "pardon record" containing the date of each application for pardon, the name of the convict, the crime committed, in what county, the term of court where the convict was convicted, the sentence of the court, the action of the governor, the reason for that action, and the date of that action).

{¶48} Warrants of pardon must be issued in "triplicate, one to be given to the convict, one to be filed with the clerk of the court * * * in whose office the sentence is recorded, and one to be filed with the head of the institution in which the convict was confined, in case he was confined." R.C. 2967.06. The warrant of pardon must be "recorded by said clerk." Id; see also R.C. 2967.04(A) (obligating the clerk of court to "record the warrant [of pardon] * * * in the journal of the court, which record, or a duly certified transcript thereof, shall be evidence of such pardon or commutation, the conditions thereof, and the acceptance of the conditions").

{¶49} Lastly, R.C. 2953.52 provides that any person may seek to expunge records relating to a charge that resulted in a finding of not guilty, in a dismissed indictment, or a no bill; the General Assembly did not list a pardon as one such scenario. See Blanchard at 229 (noting that where the legislature specified a finding of not guilty, a dismissed indictment, a no bill, or reversal on appeal would entitle an individual to expungement, the court was "forced to conclude that the legislature's failure to mention the grant of an expungement" following a pardon, "while mentioning numerous other grounds, serve[d] to exclude the instant pardon as a basis for the remedy sought"); Vickey at 767 (noting that, where the statute permitted records to be sealed if the defendant was found not guilty, the case dismissed, nolle prosequi, or a no bill returned, the court could not agree "that the omission of the term 'pardon' from these sections," all of which were "premised on a presumption of innocence," created a statutory gap, and "the omission of pardon [was] not fortuitous").

{¶50} Other jurisdictions have enacted statutes entitling a pardon recipient to expunge the record underlying the pardoned conviction. See 20 Ill.Comp.Stat. 2630/5.2(e) (stating that "[w]henver a person who has been convicted of an offense is granted a pardon by the Governor which specifically authorizes expungement, he or she may * * * have a court order entered expunging the record of arrest"); Conn.Gen.Stat. Ann. § 54-142a(D)(1) (providing that whenever "any person who has been convicted of an offense in any court of this state has received an absolute pardon for such offense, such person * * * may * * * file a petition * * * for an order of erasure"); Tex.Code.Crim.Pro.Art. 55.01(a)(1)(B)(i) (providing that a person who has been arrested "is entitled to have all records and files relating to the arrest expunged if: * * * the person is tried * * * and is * * * convicted and subsequently * * * pardoned").

V. Disposition

{¶51} In the final analysis, the state and federal law governing the effect of a pardon on a recipient's ability to seek expungement compels us to conclude that a pardon neither erases the conviction nor renders the pardon recipient innocent as if the crime were never committed. Recent case law dismissed Garland's interpretation of a pardon as dicta and acknowledged the United State Supreme Court's implicitly overruling Garland's dicta in Burdick. Because a pardon cannot work a legal fiction and erase the fact of conviction, and Bailey and similar cases have limited Pepper Pike's application to cases where the defendant has not been convicted, defendant cannot invoke the court's inherent jurisdiction to seal his records.

{¶52} Moreover, the General Assembly enacted laws specifically (1) requiring the governor to maintain a copy of both the pardon and the conviction, (2) requiring the clerk of court to maintain a copy of the warrant of pardon, which identifies the pardoned conviction, and (3) authorizing expungement of records when an individual is acquitted, found not guilty, or a no bill returned. Under (1) and (2), sealed records are of questionable value if the record of conviction, accessible through the internet, continues to reveal the underlying conviction. Under (3), if a pardon truly rendered the defendant innocent as if the crime were never committed, the General Assembly should have included pardons with the other innocence-based reasons for expungement contained in R.C. 2953.52. See New Albany Park Condominium Assn. v. Lifestyle Communities, Ltd., 195 Ohio App.3d 459, 2011-Ohio-2806, ¶ 23 (10th Dist.), quoting Barnhart v. Peabody Coal Co., 537 U.S. 149, 168 (2003), citing U.S. v. Vonn, 535 U.S. 55, 65 (2002); Summerville v. Forest Park, 128 Ohio St.3d 221, 2010-Ohio-6280, ¶ 35 (noting the expression " 'unius est exclusio alterius does not apply to every statutory listing or grouping; it has force only when the items expressed are members of an "associated group or series," justifying the inference that items not mentioned were excluded by deliberate choice, not inadvertence' ").

{¶53} Our decision is a particularly difficult one to reach, knowing today's technologically based society makes the harm perpetrated through a public criminal record accessible to virtually everyone. As a result, the so-called "[c]ollateral consequences" of a conviction "take the form of employment disqualifications in the public and private sectors, prohibitions on federal educational subsidies, housing exclusions, public benefit ineligibility, and political punishment." Lahny R. Silvia, Clean Slate: Expanding Expungements and Pardons for Non-Violent Federal Offenders, 79 U.Cin.L.Rev. 155, 164 (2010). In terms of rehabilitation, "[p]ost-release employment appears to be a, if not the, determinative factor in post-release success," but employers are typically unwilling to hire an individual with a criminal conviction. Id. at 162, 168 (citing a 1987 study of the Federal Bureau of Prisons demonstrating "ex-offenders, who arranged for post-release employment, had a recidivism rate of 27.6% compared to 53.9% of those who did not" and to additional "studies conducted over the past fifteen years" consistently showing "that on average 60% of employers indicate that they would 'probably not' or 'definitely not' consider hiring an individual with a criminal history").

{¶54} A convicted felon more deserving of a fresh start, based on the evidence in the record, is hard to imagine than defendant and his impressive turn-around. Based on the noted authority, however, defendant's pardon alone does not erase his conviction and entitle him to judicial expungement. The applicable statutes governing expungement similarly do not provide defendant with the relief desired. If that is to change, the General Assembly likely will be the entity to accomplish it. See Miller v. Fairley, 141 Ohio St. 327, 334 (1943), citing State ex rel. Bishop v. Bd. of Edn. of Mt. Orab Village School Dist., 139 Ohio St. 427, 438 (1942) (noting that if a statute does "not give the relief desired, the remedy lies with the legislative branch of the state government"); Skinner at 86, fn. 7 (stating it could be "argued that a pardon to be complete should entitle the pardoned individual * * * to secure the removal of public records of his or her arrest," and the legislature "may wish to consider amending the expungement statute to permit a pardoned individual to seek expungement").

{¶55} Because defendant is ineligible to seek judicial expungement, and also ineligible for statutory expungement, we reluctantly sustain the state's assignments of error, reverse the judgment of the Franklin County Court of Common Pleas, and remand the matter to the trial court with instructions to deny the requested record sealing.

Judgment reversed, case remanded.
